Project Title

Nineteenth-century American literature and the history of science

Project Description

This proposed project looks to investigate the relations between literature and the history and philosophy of science in the United States in the long nineteenth century. It is particularly interested in the way literature reflected the biopolitical assumptions that tied scientific discourses to the development of American racial capitalism and how literary writing can help us think through the ecological consequences of scientific extractivism.

Keywords

nineteenth-century american literature, history and philosophy of science, environmental humanities

Description of the Host Research Lab

The VALE laboratory is exclusively composed of Anglicists who are specialists in literature, in the dialogue between literature and the visual arts, and in theater.
